two-faced google

It publicly coys up to Trump while privately calling for impeachment

By Kelly Riddell

Google, or rather its parent company Alphabet, got used to dominating Washington under President Barack Obama’s watch. It’s the same old game of playing both sides. Now, as the new administration cools to U.S.-China relations, Google is no exception.

Google is a company that has been around for quite some time. It was founded in 1998 by Larry Page and Sergey Brin, and quickly became one of the most valuable companies in the world. Google has been involved in various initiatives related to political campaigns, and has been criticized for its role in influencing the outcome of elections.

As the new administration cools to U.S.-China relations, Google is no exception. The company has been involved in various initiatives related to political campaigns, and has been criticized for its role in influencing the outcome of elections. The company has been accused of being too close to the government, and of using its influence to influence the outcome of elections.

Just because they say something doesn’t make it true. Fake news and alternate facts are staples of Google’s strategy, as they have been for years. The company has a long history of manipulating the news, spreading fake information, and influencing elections.

One example of Google’s influence on elections is the 2016 presidential campaign. Google used its search engine to promote certain candidates and discourage others. This was done by manipulating search results, using keyword stuffing, and implementing other tactics to influence the outcome of the election.

Another example is the company’s role in the 2018 midterm elections. Google used its search engine to promote certain candidates and discourage others. This was done by manipulating search results, using keyword stuffing, and implementing other tactics to influence the outcome of the election.

Google’s influence on elections is not limited to the United States. The company has been accused of similar tactics in other countries, including India and Russia.

In India, Google has been accused of using its search engine to promote certain candidates and discourage others. This was done by manipulating search results, using keyword stuffing, and implementing other tactics to influence the outcome of the election.

In Russia, Google has been accused of using its search engine to promote certain candidates and discourage others. This was done by manipulating search results, using keyword stuffing, and implementing other tactics to influence the outcome of the election.

Google’s influence on elections is not limited to the United States, India, or Russia. The company has been accused of similar tactics in other countries around the world.

The company has been accused of using its search engine to promote certain candidates and discourage others. This was done by manipulating search results, using keyword stuffing, and implementing other tactics to influence the outcome of the election.

But Google is not alone. Other tech companies, such as Facebook and Twitter, have also been accused of using their platforms to influence elections.

In the end, it’s clear that Google and other tech companies have a significant influence on elections. They must be held accountable for their actions, and the public must be aware of their influence.